Wollumbin Mount Warning Mt Warning Road

As the remnant plug of the ancient Tweed volcano, the towering peak (1,157m) of Wollumbin Mt Warning is visible from every corner of the Valley and way out at sea.

It is a site of great spiritual significance to the local Aboriginal people and is believed to mark a convergence of the earth's energy lines (ley lines).

Wollumbin is the Aboriginal name for the mountain with one meaning being "cloud-catcher" and is a sacred place of great spiritual significance to the people of the Bundjalung Nation.

Captain Cook sailed along Australia's east coast in 1770, saw the mountain from the sea and named it Mount Warning to warn future mariners of the dangerous offshore reefs he encountered.

Experience the magic of this sacred place and its World Heritage listed rainforests on the 300m Lyrebird Track or challenge yourself to the 8.8km (return) hike to the summit. You should allow 4 hours for the summit track and walkers are advised not to depart after 12pm.

The Tweed Valley is home to one of the world's largest eroded volcanic calderas. Explore this ancient region by car and discover the quaint towns and villages of the Tweed Valley.

Start at the Visitor Information Centre in Murwillumbah where you can chat to local staff and learn more information about the region. Stop for morning tea in the main street and explore the art deco architecture of the 1940s. Make your way out to Crystal Creek, Chillingham and Limpinwood where you can experience stunning views of the western rim of the caldera.

Journey to Tyalgum for a lunch then make your way through Eungella. From here you can head back to Murwillumbah or journey to Wollumbin National Park and travel a little further to explore the charming village of Uki.
